Wetlands and Urbanization presents an integrated watershed approach to the scientific evaluation of the impact of landscape urbanization on wetland functions. It associates the source of impact (the landscape) with the sink (the wetland), relates findings to implications for future planning and management of watersheds and provides a model for future comprehensive investigations of wetland impacts from urbanization.

Abstract Abstract Urbanization is a major cause of loss of coastal wetlands. Urbanization also exerts significant influences on the structure and function of coastal wetlands, mainly through modifying the hydrological and sedimentation regimes, and the dynamics of nutrients and chemical pollutants.

The Puget Sound Wetlands and Stormwater Management Research Program (PSWSMRP) was a ten-year regional research effort intended to document the impacts of urbanization on wetlands. The wetlands included in the study were representative of those found in the Puget Sound Lowlands ecoregion, most likely to be impacted by urban development.

Urbanization has affected the inflows received by these wetlands thus having an impact on the wetland extent as well as wetlands condition. Temporal analysis of earth observation data further revealed that the natural vegetation cover has also been converted to built up along with the agricultural land.

Abstract. Constructed wetlands are recognised as a cost-effective and socially acceptable stormwater treatment option within urban landscapes, satisfying a range of urban design objectives, including flood protection and treating stormwater. While wetlands also provide habitat for aquatic biota, and often act as a refuge for wildlife, there is growing concern that as wetlands become polluted, they could become toxic to aquatic life and lead to extensive costs for the disposal of sediments.
